THE RIGHT combination of rain and sunshine should have the East Bay's natural vegetation looking its best in time for the sixth annual Bringing Back the Natives Garden Tour on May 2.

While the actual event is still more than a month away, the online registration deadline is April 20 for the popular free tour, which tends to fill up early.

Tour founder Kathy Kramer, of San Pablo, has lined up 50 pesticide-free gardens in Alameda and Contra Costa counties that each feature at least 50 percent native plants.

Kramer started the tour to showcase the visual and practical possibilities of gardens more in tune with their surroundings. A native plant garden uses about one-tenth the water (and the energy needed to pump it) of a traditional garden, doesn't contaminate the water because no pesticides or fertilizer are needed and provides a habitat for birds, bees, butterflies and other wildlife, she says.

Gardens on the self-guided tour are grouped by climate, since native plants in warm-weather inland areas differ from those in milder climates nearer the Bay.

There are participating Bayside gardens this year in Pinole, El Cerrito, El Sobrante, Richmond Berkeley, Oakland and Castro Valley, ranging from "large parcels in the hills to small lots in the flats." For those who want to make their own yard more harmonious, selected locations will have scheduled talks by experts and sales of native plants.

Registration, which is done online at www.bringingbackthenatives.net, closes early to allow time to mail this year's tour book to the more than 5,000 expected participants.

In conjunction with the tour is a "Native Plant Sale Extravaganza" on May 1 and 2 at participating nurseries, including Richmond locations The Watershed Nursery and Annie's Annuals and Perennials.

Volunteers are always needed to help staff locations, and those who provide assistance can meet the owner and get a private tour of the garden they will be staffing. Find volunteer details at the Bringing Back the Natives Garden Web site, <http://bringingbackthenatives.net>.
